Pamplin group questions savings

By BILL SHERROD

A large crowd of Appomattox County citizens packed the county court house last Tuesday night for the second public meeting regarding the proposed closing of Pamplin Elementary School.

Superintendent of Schools in Appomattox County, Lloyd Walton, relayed figures which he has compiled regarding possible savings over a three-year period if the Pamplin School is closed.

Walton's projected figures included savings in operational costs of $109,000, 144,100, and $167,800 over the next three years as well as savings of $135,000 in the estimated cost of renovating the building to bring it up to minimal standards.

Thomas W. Lawson, an Appomattox attorney representing several individuals in Pamplin, disputed the projected savings.

Lawson said, "You can't expect to transfer 146 children (from Pamplin) up here (to Appomattox) at no cost."

Lawson said that the average cost per student at the Appomattox Elementary and Primary Schools is $838. Noting that Walton affirmed that this figure would remain the same for the Pamplin students or increase slightly due to inflation, Lawson said that the $838 per student multiplied by the 146 students would result in additional operating costs of $122,348 to the Appomattox schools."Compared with the $143,197 it cost to run the Pamplin school (last year)that is a savings of only slightly over $20,000, not $109,000," said Lawson.

Walton said later that the savings will "not be realized from the difference in the cost of educating a child in the Pamplin School compared to this, however, noting that the cost of educating a child in the Appomattox Schools...The savings will be realized because there will be room in the schools in the town of Appomattox to accomodate the Pamplin students starting with the 1982-83 session."

Lawson further questioned the cost of renovating the building to bring it up to minimal standards, stating
